Excerpt from Canadian Bicentenary Papers: No. I, the History of Nonconformity in England in 1662; No. II, the Reasons for Nonconformity in Canada in 1862 The celebrated John Locke, a most competent witness, has left on record some striking observations illustrative of the spirit in which the Act of Uniformity was framed and passed, and while he expresses his own view of the reason why many complied with the Act, he clearly shows that it was meant to exclude the most conscientious and devout. He says Immediately after this, followed the Act of Uniformity. This, the clergy, i.e., the greater part, readily complied with; for you know that sort of men are taught rather to obey than understand, and to use that learning they have, to justify, not to examine. And yet that Bartholomew-day was fatal to our church and religion, in throwing out a very great number of worthy, learned, pious, and orthodox divines, who could not come up to this and other things in the Act. And it is upon this occasion worthy your knowledge, that so great was the zeal in carrying on this church affair, and so blind was the obedience required, that if you compute the time of the passing of this Act, with the time allowed for the clergy to subscribe the Book of Common Prayer, thereby established, you shall find it could not be printed and distributed so as one man in forty could have seen the book they so perfectly assent and consent to. It is a fact that the Common Prayer Book,...
