On Walrus Island, in the Pribilof group, we found them nesting with the paroquet and least auklets in exactly similar situations under the loose bowlders which were piled up on the beach. Here we had no trouble in moving the rocks sufficiently to uncover the eggs, but we experienced considerable difficulty in identifying the eggs. Whereas the paroquet auklet usually sat complacently on its egg or crouched near it, the crested auklet usually ran away as soon as we began to move the rocks, and we would soon see it scurrying out from under our feet and flying off to sea. Only occasionally did we succeed in catching one near enough to its egg to identify it. The single egg was laid on the bare rock or ground or on a bed of small loose stones, which could hardly be called a nest. At the time of our visit, July 7, 1911, the eggs of this and the other auklets were in various stages of incubation, but no young were found. The following account by Mr. C. H. Townsend (1913) would seem to indicate that the center of abundance of the crested auklet lies south of the Alaska Peninsula. He writes: On the evening of August 1 the Albatross came to anchor in Yukon Harbor at Big Koniushl Island, of the Shumagin group. While the ship was working her way into this wild and uninhabited bay everyone...
