David was a Chicago White Sox Rookie of the Year pitching sensation. On a warm autumn evening, he attended a lavish party held in his honor at the posh Four Seasons hotel in New York. The celebration attracted everyone who was anyone, even a television crew. No one there noticed the monster, wearing sunglasses and black boots, waiting impatiently for the rowdy revelers to depart. He wanted to be alone with his fine, pretty, blond prey. They would have a special party together. The monsters crazed overtures of love were spurned. He retaliated by brutally assaulting David, leaving him for dead in an abandoned building. Thankfully, the pitcher was found, and he recuperated from his serious injuries, enduring months of painful physical therapy. Now traumatized and despondent, he became a quiet, sullen, semi-drunken loner who bought cheap booze and chased women. He found his way to Las Vegas, where he racked up astonishing gambling debts in a casino. Amanda was a beautiful supermodel and philanthropist. Her latest fianc intended to marry her in Las Vegas, but he left out one crucial detail he was already married. Amanda decided that she would seek her rightful revenge by finding some kind of a man to marry her anyway. Clad in a resplendent wedding gown, she stepped onto the casino floor and zeroed in on David. When Amanda and David met at a blackjack table, their mutual dislike for each other was palpable. David lost a significant bet that he made to Amanda, and he was forced to marry her that same night. For reasons neither of them would fully reveal, they agreed to live together platonically for one month. The couple had a...
