Not illustrated. 1892 Excerpt: .of making the chalice after vesting: there are directions for this in the treatise de expositione missae, by William of Gouda. Not following the rubrics of his own order, he directs the priest to make the chalice directly he has finished vesting, and apparently some time before he says confiteor. It would seem that the local practice of Germania inferior is being described, though the friars minor have been always known for their devotion to the ceremonial of the Roman Church. In the annexed Table, the number of cases where this practice is clearly ordered is but small. It shows, however, a number of rites in which the chalice was made early in the service; from the time of approaching the altar to the end of the collects, forming a cluster which cannot so conveniently be thrown under one heading as the preceding groups. The next..
