Excerpt from Confederate Veteran, Vol. 36: April, 1928 No one was more energetic and forward looking than Fisher, once it was foreseen that war was inevitable, in preparing for the conflict. Beginning in April, 1861, he raised the first North Carolina regiment, although it bore the name of the Sixth. The expense of the entire equipment for the regiment was defrayed out of his private purse, which had no parallel in North Carolina; and the regiment bore the beautiful flag made and embroidered by Colonel Fisher's sister, Christine. This regiment, composed in large measure of men who had worked with him or under him for years, followed him with a measure of devotion equal to that which Lee inspired. They not only had unbounded confidence in Fisher, they admired him deeply and loved him devotedly. His affection for and pride in them, says the late John S. Henderson, was equal to their's for him. A few days before his death he said of the officers: where human flesh dare venture they will go. Of the men, he said: there is not a man in the regiment who, after four and twenty hours of fasting and labor, will not go into battle as if just from sleep and refreshment. The after career of the regiment proved how well he knew it. It covered itself with glory at Gettysburg and was among the last to surrender at Appomattox.
