Excerpt: .has been employed by me for the pains of locomotor ataxia, where it exerts a most favorable action very promptly. A feature which is noticeable is, that its action is prompt, rarely more than twenty minutes being consumed before its effects are appreciable. I might continue to outline clinical reports of the use of this drug, but that would further carry out my purpose. My object in writing this paper is to call attention to the fact that the use of opium is almost needless, and that inasmuch as we have an agent which gives us the desired results, we would not consult the best interests of our patients in giving opium preparations with that old time freedom which produced so many bad results. I believe this feeling is growing in the ranks of the profession. Its field is becoming more and more defined, and this is a healthy sign of growing progress. It is the highest scientific attainment to know when a certain remedy fits a certain case, and the value of the practitioner to his patient cannot be overestimated when he is armed with this knowledge. Hence. He must be rapid in thought and have a good, clear judgment. His knowledge must be well digested and at hand, so that he can call upon the storehouse of his practical knowledge for whatever he needs at any and all times and in every emergency. Though he may be influenced by the suggestions...
