As soon as he had regained his breath and arranged his dress a bit, he ran into the town to the justice. My lord judge, he said, I have a sorry tale to tell; see how a rascally man has used me on the public highway, robbed and beaten me! a stone on the ground might pity me; my clothes all torn, my body scratched and wounded all over, poverty come upon me with the loss of my purse, besides several ducats, one piece more valuable than all the others; for Heaven s sake let the man be put in prison! Was it a soldier, inquired the judge, who has thus cut you with his sabre? God forbid! cried the Jew; it was no sword the rogue had, but he carried a gun upon his shoulder, and a fiddle slung round his neck; the evil wretch is easily known. So the judge sent his people out after the man, and they soon found the Servant, whom they drove slowly before them, when they found the purse upon him. As soon as he was set before the judge he said, I have not touched the Jew, nor taken his money; for he gave it to me of his own freewill, because he wished me to cease my fiddling, which he could not endure. Heaven defend us! cried the Jew, he tells lies as fast as he can...
