Excerpt from The History of Life Insurance in the United States to 1870: With an Introduction to Its Development Abroad In the early history of life insurance four primary stages of development may be distinguished. The first of these may be called the period of experiment. It extends from the earliest beginnings down to the year 1700. During this time the practice of keeping mortality records originated, and the fundamental laws of probability were evolved and applied to the valuation of human life. Underwriting was done by individuals, and toward the end of the period some distribution of risk was accomplished by the insurers, since it became customary to accept but a small portion of each one of a number of separate hazards. The second stage may be designated the speculative, assessment period. It extends from 1700 to 1721, and is distinguished by the fact that assessment associations of a highly speculative nature were formed for effecting life insurance. The third period, from 1721 to 1760, may be termed the era of scientific progress, since it is characterized by the progress made in the science of life contingencies. The fourth and last epoch, from 1760 to 1800, is one in which the advent of modern life insurance occurred. It was during this time that insurance for the whole of life on an annual level premium basis, and with a reserve fund to meet liabilities in increasing with advancing age, was put into practical operation.
