CreateSpace Independent Publishing Platform. Paperback. Condition: New. This item is printed on demand. 180 pages. Dimensions: 9.0in. x 6.0in. x 0.4in. There was once a South Sea Island supercargo named Denison who had a Kanaka father and mother. This was when Denison was a young man. His fathers name was Kuisis; his mothers Tulp. Also, he had several brown-skinned, lithe-limbed, and big-eyed brothers and sisters, who made much of their new white brother, and petted and caressed and wept over him as if he were an ailing child of six instead of a tough young fellow of two-and-twenty who had nothing wrong with him but a stove-in rib and a heart that ached for home, which made him cross and fretful. But Denison hasnt got much to do with this story, so all I need say of him is that he had been the supercargo of a brig called the Leonora; and the Leonora had been wrecked on Strongs Island in the North Pacific; and Denison had quarrelled with the captain, whose name was Bully Hayes; and so one day he said goodbye to the roystering Bully and the rest of his shipmates, and travelled across the lagoon till he came...
