Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Glimpse of Prison Life (From the San Francisco Daily News June 5, 1909.)If you chance to meet J. Wess Moore, you wont have any trouble in identifying him. He looks more like Uncle Sam than any one you know, with the shrewd, kindly features familiar to the caricature and inevitable chin beard. He will offer you, if you seem approachable, a pamphlet of verse entitled, Glimpses of Prison Life. Its price is whatever you are inclined to give, but whatever that may be, it will be well applied. Echoes were written before Moore was admitted to parole. Every one of them was suggested by some experience of his eight years in stripes, part of his life sentence for killing the man who had jumped his claim. The verse form is simple, often crude, but the thoughts, are not, for they are thoughts that would not down. Moore did not begin life either as a poet or philosopher. He was a farmer boy in the old Quaker town of Dublin, Indiana. Where barely 15 years of age he ran away to war. He was too ?young to enlist, so he went as a drummer boy and camp follower with the village volunteers in the Army of the Cumber land. A year later he was sent home sick, when he obtained his mothers consent to enlist. Then he served two years and two months more, with Sherman to the sea, and in the bloody fields of Atlanta. When mustered out, he farmed in Indiana until ruined by floods, which sent him west to Nebraska. Here a cyclone demolished his buildings and he came on to California. With...
