Excerpt from Primer for Town Farmers: March, 1927 My neighbor, Smith, is one of those town farmers Who is quite a fan for flowers, but still keeps a plot of ground about 30 by 40 feet on which he grows a few beans, peas, a bed of lettuce, a few spring onions, a small block of Lima beans, 25 or 80 tomato plants trained to stakes, and carrots, radishes, beets, and peppers. Smith has been spading this plot of ground and working compost into it for the last two or three weeks, doing the work evenings when the soil was in good condition to work. He has just finished planting peas, lettuce, and radishes. A few evenings ago he dropped in to see me. I was putting the finishing touches to a piece of ground where I intend to plant beans as soon as the soil warms up a little. He asked me what I was going to plant there.
