E. towards the ocean (Tonga ss Passage). Ibid. In the hope of gaining a more northerly and westerly communication with the sea, he did not take this passage, and soon found that the channel he was then pursuing also communicated with the ocean, making the land to the southward one or more islands (Sitklan and Kannaghunut Islands). He found that from the north-west point of this land, situate in latitude 54 45J, longitude 229 28 (this, it maybe remarked, was on Kannaghunut Island, and indicates the entrance of the channel), the Pacific was evidently visible. He had thus been still pursuing the westerly channel, keeping Sitklan and Kannaghunut Islands to the south, and Tongass Island to the north. This ended the exploration; and, on the following day, the 3rd August, he turned northward, and, after exploring Nakat Inlet, turned westward, reaching a point on the continental coast which he then named Cape Fox, and took shelter for the night in a cove close by. His journey had thus comprised the ascent of the canal from the point at which he entered it by the branch to its head, and its descent past that point by the westerly and northerly channel, to the ocean between Tongass and Kannaghunut Islands, in latitude 54 45, longitude 229 28. This examination occupied from the 27th July to the 2nd August. Vancouver then proceeded to explore Revilla Gigedo and other neighbouring islands. On the 14th August, on...
