Excerpt from American Railways Under Government Operation and the Financial Outlook In the first stage, the energy of private, venture some capital extended rail lines into every corner of our great country, gradually enabling each State to attach itself to and become a part of the political and economic life. Railroads were eagerly sought for by every community and subsidies represented by land grants, partial payment of cost and relief from taxation, as enticements to private venture, were so extreme as often to lead to overbuilding, resulting in transference of liquid capital to permanent investment at such rapid rates as to form the bases for the panics of 1873 and 1893. During this stage the opening of the way to subsidies and the extreme desire for favorable treatment after construction, prompted rail road owners and managers to control, as far as they might, the politics in the territories in which they were interested. Thus, the so-called railroad interests became to such an extent powers in political life that in many States it became impossible to elect a candidate to public office who had not their approval. This political control by railroad interests led to many abuses and developed an anti-railroad attitude among the people, which as fostered by political leaders generally who sought preferment on that platform. This fact, combined with the high finance that was madly practiced in the flotation of new and often speculative railroad enterprises, brought to an end the great construction or development stage of railroad history, and ushered in the period of State and Government regulation.
