A great many Democrats have had the same desires this year that he has had. They have had definite convictions as to the fatuity of the Chicago platform, and have wished to see the Democratic national ticket defeated, but they have wanted to see someone else oppose it and beat it, while they gave it a nominal support and preserved their regularity. The selfishness of their position has been profound. THE prospect of Bryan s election has had the same terrors for them that it has had for other sane citizens; the principles set forth in the Chicago platform have been as revolting to their intelligence as to that of their brethren, but they have restrained their patriotic impulse to bolt for fear that after election they might be found outside the breastworks. It has been a hard season for them, for they have found neither honor nor comfort nor profit in their course, and there is no reason to think that honor or comfort, if profit, is awaiting them. What the Democratic party needs, wrote Mr. Thacher, in his letter of withdrawal, is wise, fearless, and powerful organization, which will respond to every beat of the popular heart. What the party needs, Mr. Thacher, is wise and fearless leaders, who will use their intelligence and their conscience in their leadership. To such...
