Not illustrated. 1913 Excerpt: .underlying the direct comparison method of heterochromatic photometry. Although it is always difficult to make a positive judgment that two stimuli of different color are of equal brightness, a ratio of intensities can easily be established for which a perfectly secure judgment of inequality of brightness can be delivered. Consequently, for any pair of colors it is possible to determine a definite differential threshold for brightness, and this should be a function of the colors, or of the difference between them. METHOD In the present investigation four standard spectral stimuli were chosen, of mean wave-lengths, 693, 575, 505, 475 na, respectively, representing as nearly as possible the four psychological primaries. These were compared with each other and with nine additional colors taken at intervals of 30 nn across the spectrum. The wave-length ranges of the stimuli varied from 4 to 30 nn, according to the position in the spectrum. The photometric field was viewed against a dark background, and consisted of four vertically juxtaposed, rectangular areas, with a common horizontal dimension of 1.02 degrees. The upper rectangle was filled with the standard color, and the lower rectangle with the comparison color, the height of each of these areas being 0.97 degree. Between them were two bands, of height 0.34 degree each, the upper of which was filled with the comparison colors and the lower with the standard. In making the judgments, attention was directed primarily to these bands. The field was produced by means of a...
