COMPOSITION--SECOND YEAR. This study is pursued during two quarters. It aims to give the student an understanding of the method underlying narration, description, exposition, and persuasion, to the end that he may express his own thoughts clearly and impressively, and have that knowledge of oral and written expression that is necessary for the teacher. PROFESSIONAL ENGLISH. After the courses outlined above have been completed, ten weeks are given to a consideration of the teaching of English in the grades. This work is taken up under the following heads--conversation lessons, story-telling, written composition, outlines, spelling and dictation, grammar, and the art of criticism. Besides getting an acquaintance with much that has been written on the subject of language work, as to aims, method, and available material, students get useful information at first hand by the examination of written work from the training department. They are required to write numerous plans for conducting language classes, which are criticised from a practical point of view. This branch in a degree continues the work begun in composition, especially a more extended view of the development of the paragraph, but in the main it takes on a different aspect. In composition the student accepted the laws of writing and applied them to his own productions; in rhetoric he examines...
