Not illustrated. 1918 Excerpt: . of one of the best-steel bearings, has brought to the foreground the question as to whether cast steel is a suitable material for bridge construction. Cast steel for bearings has the advantage that it can be built into forms and thicknesses for which riveted work is impracticable. Large steel castings, however, are difficult to make. Experience has shown that unless great care is taken in casting the metal, internal defects may develop, which are difficult to detect. Further, unless properly annealed, as soon as the cores are removed, or after any subsequent local heating, internal stresses will remain in the casting, and may be large enough to cause breakage under slight shock. This applies particularly to complicated castings, or castings in which the metal varies considerably in thickness and, therefore, does not cool uniformly. Simplicity and uniform thickness, therefore, should be the aim in designing the castings....
