Excerpt from The Christian Merchant: A Discourse Delivered in the Church of the Divine Unity, on the Occasion of the Death of Jonathan Goodhue A common and favorite form of evading the demands of the Gospel, is to maintain their incompatibility with the necessary conditions of human life. Under other and more favorable circumstances, we inwardly reason, the Christian life might be possible; and under almost any others than those beneath which we ourselves are struggling, less difficult; while our own providential lot seems directly hostile to, if not absolutely irreconcilable with, the spirit and conduct required by Christ. Nothing but examples of the Christian life, under all varieties of circumstance, and amid the most trying and disadvantageous scenes, can adequately silence objections like these. The world needs to see men springing up in its busiest and most exposed paths, walking amid the flames of its most devouring passions, handling its most seductive and betraying objects, in contact with its most poisonous evils, and yet maintaining there, principles which are above the sphere in which they move - aims that stoop not to the level on which they stand; a purity that is not to be contaminated; a character above suspicion or reproach.
