Excerpt from America s Possible Share, in the Economic Future of Russia The signing of the armistice and the prospect of durable peace in the very near future have somewhat revived interest in Russia and in the Russian market among American business-men. In response to this interest displayed by individual business-men as well as by various trade-industrial organizations, I am issuing this pamphlet devoted to the possibilities for American-Russian commercial and financial cooperation. The pamphlet contains the essentials of my two pamphlets, Commercial Russia and The Russian Market, its Possibilities and Problems, issued by the American-Russian Chamber of Commerce during 1916, and also of an article of mine published several months ago in the Daily Standard Statistics Service. Although the prospect of peace has, as I have said before, revived interest in Russia among individual American business-men and various trade-industrial organizations, this interest is still insufficient considering the importance of the possible American-Russian trade and financial cooperation from the point of view of the benefit of both countries. Bolshevism, with its wild experiments in Russia s political, cultural and economic life, with all the misfortune and destruction it has brought Russia, naturally scares and disappoints many who were previously sincerely interested in Russia. This disappointment should not becloud the proper perspective necessary for an understanding of the Russian problem as it stands to-day. Great is the destruction brought upon Russia by the plague of Bolshevism, great and bloody are the sacrifices borne by the present Russian generation. But, from the point of view of Russia s national existence all her present misfortunes, inevitable in a period of transition to a higher form of State organization, are insignificant and will pass in a short...
