Excerpt from Outlines for Study of Mammalian Ecology and Life Histories With some mammals, which are of such size, number, and temperament that laboratory work with them is possible, studies like that of Yerkes (1907) with the dancing mouse may be counted on to yield results of the highest importance in respect to such problems as sense development and discrimination, habit formation, learning ability, and modifiability of behavior. The work of Sumner although largely concerned with problems of evolution and genetics, has afforded much information of value in studies of life history; Many mammals, however, cannot be so easily brought into the laboratory or successfully kept in captivity. The ideal method is for the life history student working in the Open to carry his investigations into the laboratory whenever possible. The two fields are so vast and specialized, however, that this is rarely practicable. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books. Find more at This book is a reproduction of an important historical work.
