Excerpt from The North American Review, Vol. 111: Sculpture gave life to the whole edifice and told its story through speaking forms, which kindled enthusiastic reverence in the worshipper as his eye wandered from the pediment to the metopes, followed the circling frieze, and at last rested upon the majestic figure of the titular deity within the cella, which looked, says a Greek poet, as if the god had come down to earth to reveal himself to the sculptor, that he might represent him as he is. Painting brought out the varied lines of the architecture, gave relief to the groups between the triglyphs, marked the folds of the draperies, and rendered every detail of ornament distinct and clear; while architecture, holding the decorative arts in its firm grasp, served as a framework to display their beauties to advantage, and borrowed from them a grace which enhanced their special perfections. The warriors shield suspended to a column, the embroidered peplos, the great silver bowl made out of the tithes of the spoils of a battle field, and the painted vase placed within the...
