Everything which we have so far learned from the application of the scientific method about the extended universe tends toward standing in support of Spinoza s concept of the one substance which constitutes the being of, and beyond that, is the cause of everything. Beginning with the weirdly named big bang ; all objects in the known universe emanated from one source. This source originated in an unimaginably huge detonation which exploded from its compressed state, and transformed into all of the matter and the dark matter which taken together account for all that is visible, invisible and measureable: galaxies, constellations, solar systems, planets and people. Each of these objects, considered individually, is comprised in some measure of concatenations of elements in the atomic table. The chemical composition of gaseous matter present during the birth of stars and the molecular chemical structure of the cause of life forms on earth stand in direct relation. Along with similar molecular elements they further share the source of their inception; pressure and energy fueled by either fission or fusion. The big bang , which for our purposes can be considered at the very least as the proximate cause of the universe, begat the matter which forms the elemental structures of heavenly bodies and all planetary life forms. Long before it would have been conceived of as possible Baruch intuited one self-caused substance which could not be conceived of as other than existent and further and which must be understood to comprise a state of infinite being. This ontos encapsulates at the functional level the twin attributes of thought and extension, plus an infinite number of other attributes which we can deduce logically but not...
