If the rate of rotation has appreciably varied during geological history, it is almost certain that the oblateness of the earth-spheroid has also varied, for unless the rigidity of the earth greatly exceeds that of any known substance, it must have been modified in form under changing rotation so as to approach the shape it would assume if it were a perfect fluid. It would be an error to assume, as is sometimes done, that the earth would conform to the fluidal shape perfectly, but that it would approach to this with a measurable degree of closeness seems to be beyond question. If there was a change from a high rotational speed, and consequent high degree of oblateness, to a slower speed with less oblateness, the surface area of the earth must...
