Excerpt from Disintegration of Girdled Western Hemlock and Grand Fir The occurrence of overmature defective trees is responsible for some of the most difficult management problems in the western white pine type. Grand fir and western hemlock in particular are highly susceptible to Woodarotting fungi. In addition, because of their shade tolerance, they often inhibit or prevent establishment and growth of the more desirable but less shade-tolerant species such as western white pine. Hence, many of the management practices for the white pine type provide for the removal of trees of undesirable form, condition, or species. Girdling is one method of removing such trees. This method was extensively used by the U. S. Forest Service between 1915 and 1930 on timber sales in the western white pine type. Although girdling lowvalue trees was discontinued as a stand improvement measure after 1930 because of the high fire hazard of the resulting snags (figure there were reasons to consider the method worthy of further study. For example, it is a comparatively cheap and effective way to destroy an occasional large tree, such as a wolf tree which is suppressing desirable reproduction. Tests 2/1tere made, accordingly, to determine the effect of girdling on cone production, mortality, rate of disintegration of trees, end.damage to reproduction. Results of these studies are described in this report. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
