Excerpt from The Influence of Literature: An Oration Gentlemen of the Erosopic and Philomathic Societies: During the reign of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, the wisest man that ever sat upon the throne of the Imperial Caesars, an insurrection was fomented by Avidius Cassius, a descendant of the conspirator against the great Dictator. Although he was the commander-in-chief of the Oriental army stationed at Antioch, he was narrow-minded, fanatical, visionary, cruel and rigid in his discipline. He was morose, and devoid of sympathy with the aims, and tastes, and pleasures of the world. Consequently, he resolved that the soldiers subject to his authority should not enjoy the luxuries and delights that appeared on the thoroughfares, and haunted the groves, and lurked near the temples of Daphne by Orontes, which was proverbial for all the allurements that could captivate the senses. For there, amid numberless kinds and forms of voluptuousness, the fire-eyed daughters of the Sun, with mystical songs and magical rites, wove charms and snares for the fame and souls of men. In the execution of this purpose, the ferocious general decapitated some, and amputated the arms, and hands, and feet of others, in order that the horrible spectacles might deter their comrades from any act of disobedience. He hoped by this conduct to obtain such complete mastery over his legions, that they would follow him without hesitation in the unwise and impracticable enterprise of dethroning the Emperor and re-establishing the Republic of Rome. His movements were observed by Lucius Verus, the colleague of Antoninus, who wrote to him, saying: I would you had him closely watched.
