Excerpt from Antoinette of Illinois: A Story of Early America After their Highnesses had greeted the King, one of the greatest nobles of France handed him his stock ings; another his shoes, and yet another his shirt. All of these were donned by Louis with commendable deftness and precision. In fact, with regard to such matters, Louis was something of a perfectionist. Two noble lords with a silver. Pitcher full of water and a basin, washed his face and hands. Then, with much assistance, the royal legs were thrust into the royal breeches. A less important noble smoothed the royal cravat, and yet another put in place the great six-inchwig. As the heels of his shoes measured some three inches in height, the King, a modest five feet three in bed, now stood up, an imposing six-footer. There was some discussion as to the coat that he ought to wear. Frequently he wore a sumptuous velvet coat of cinnamon color. Today someone suggested that he put on the gorgeous red coat, encrusted with diamonds, a garment that had cost more than a million francs, but, strictly speaking, that coat was de ri gueur solely for wear when receiving Visiting mon archs. Louis finally selected the golden coat, stiff with silver ?eurs-de-lis. All of this was important because, on this day, the King was to receive the Great La Salle, the Pride of France, just arrived from New France (canada) and Louisiana, Louis great domain in North America a} 04} During the hour preceding noon, La Salle, escorted by the younger Colbert, son of the late great prime minister, had marvelled at the groves of transplanted trees, the vast lawns, the artificial lakes, and...
