Defects in the web or the base of the rail are also extremely difficult to detect. So far I have only talked about the parts of the rail you can see. But we also need a way to inspect the subgrade, or the part be-neath the track. FRA has identified ground-penetrating radar as a promising technology for finding poor track conditions that are hid-den below the surface, and is working on developing a prototype system which will produce quantitative indices of track subsurface conditions. Once the prototype is completed, it will be installed on FRAs T-18 car for field testing in the spring of 2006. Collisions and overspeed derailments must also be prevented. PTC is an advanced train control technology that can prevent train collisions with automatic brake applications. It also provides for automatic compliance with speed restrictions and enhanced protec-tion of roadway workers. FRAs final rule enabling Positive Train Control became effective in March 2005. The rule is a performance standard for a system railroads may choose to install, but does not require it to be in-stalled. FRA is promoting the implementation of PTC by sponsor-ing development of technologies through partnerships with States and railroads, and by helping to provide NDGPS, a satellite-based navigation aid. FRA is also working on projects in Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Alaska. A significant challenge for FRA and the railroads in developing all such systems is to lower the cost of implementation. A fundamental technology for enabling the implementation of PTC systems is a network of reference...
