If the moths are out injured in any way so that they cannot fly, they soon fall a prey to the numerous ants, which are always on the look-out for disabled insects of any kind, and butterflies and moths in particular. When ants come across a moth which has been damaged so much as to impede its flight, you will see them trotting around the helpless insect until it would appear that they had made up their minds as to how their prey was to be tackled. This is accomplished in many cases, particularly with heavy beetles which have been injured and are either lying helplessly on their backs or trying to roll over and over, by the ant first proceeding to gnaw off the feet of the insect attacked. Having done this they next bite off the palpi,...
