This was doubtless done to remedy any want of level or squareness in the base of the obelisk; and by shifting the iron more or less toward the centre the amount of remedy could be adjusted. Strange to say, I could not find any trace of iron on the base-blocks of these obelisks; possibly some other metal or softer material was put between the obelisk and the block, to prevent the weight scaling the granite if the obelisk rested on one edge. These pieces of iron may be seen on obelisks No. 49 Plan (two pieces) and No. 59 (three pieces about 3 inches across). At the eastern end of the temple are two obelisks (271, 276 Plan) without any scenes at the lower...
