While in Muscatine, Iowa, under the auspices of the commercial club, I protested against the officers promoting a public market for the reason that it would antagonize the resident capacity to build social and material welfare. Whatever embarrasses the home business man is of doubtful merit inasmuch as the local business man is a leader in promoting social as well as other community welfare, those intangible but invaluable desiderata of every town. Business men personify Constructive Genius, therefore the commercial club of Muscatine, which was organized to conserve local life of the community, sought to destroy it by a public market, which was an incident kindred to that of the commercial club of Valley City, North Dakota, raising with which to equip their club rooms and the committee traveling all the way to St. Paul, Minnesota, and purchasing at retail there.
