This was an enclave-based economic restructuring, unaccompanied by political 21 liberalization. It is likely that any successful reorganization of Cuban political economy will require massive foreign investment and a reorientation to export-led growth in 22 nontraditional sectors. While this strategy is probably correct, it poses serious problems of legitimacy to a leadership that has made the rejection of capitalism and market economics a 23 central tenet of its economic model. Two additional problems loom large. One is that, despite very generous terms and facilities offered to foreign capital, the latter has yet to take full advantage of them. While the amount of foreign investment received thus far is substantial, it is insufficient to pull the country out of its deep recession and to make the official strategy of re-equilibration successful. By spring 1993, there were close to 300 foreign firms already operating in Cuba, including...
