Excerpt from Purchasing: Its Economic Aspects and Proper Methods Purchasing is one of the primary functions in the activities of the great complex structure we call business. The acquisition of raw material is the initial step incurred in the cost of manufacturing anything. In merchandising, a purchase must be made before a sale can be effected. In construction work, tools and equipment must be procured before workmen can commence operations. The significance of this subject is brought forcibly to the attention when it is realized that every undertaking in its inception involves the necessity of buying something, and the continuance of its activities perpetuates this important function.
