Just then the dinner began to hiss in the oven, a fragrant odour prevaded the room, and when in halfan-hour after, the table was spread, Jone o Pee s took his place beside his future dame, the happiest man in all Hazelworth. About one o clock the following morning, when the hitherto noisy village had sunk into quiet, and only a few stragglers, worse for the day s pastime, could be met with, the hero of the preceding pages might have been seen cleaving the moonlight on his way home. His person was not so erect as when he entered Hazelworth in the morning. His chin hung upon his breast, and his once white stockings, now a darkish grey, seemed to be describing a very...
