Excerpt: . thou believe that I have dug the grave of thy daughter, of her who ought to be my wife? What sayst thou? replied the old man.-- I loved Atala, cried I, the daughter of that woman of Florida whom thou once lovedst. My voice was completely stifled by my tears. I was overwhelmed by a thousand recollections--the love of country, liberty, my lost native wilds! Lopez, who could scarcely comprehend me, begged that I would explain myself. I gave him a concise account of my adventures. He was affected by it: he admired and wept for that daughter whom he had never known. He launched out into long regrets on the subject of that happiness which we might have enjoyed together in a hut in the recesses of some wilderness. But, my son, added he, God decreed otherwise, and it is our duty to submit. No sooner had you left me at St. Augustin than I was accused by wicked men: some powerful colonists, whom I had deprived of a number of Indian slaves, by redeeming them at a high price, joined my enemies. The governor, who was one of the latter, caused my sister and myself to be seized: we were carried to Mexico and delivered up to the Inquisition. We were acquitted, but not till after an imprisonment of several years, during which my sister died. I was then permitted to return to St. Augustin. My property had been sold. I waited...
