Not illustrated. 1917 Excerpt: . the flowering season ends, their life ends, but their eggs weather the winter and hatch on the return of the next warm season. Bees and some other winged insects obtain their foods in the same manner. playing a little, as they go. I watched a pair of butterflies go half a mile from land over the water. They turned and flew back to the starting point, and resumed their quest for food from the flowers. By watching the bees gather flower sap and convert it into honey, increased my interest in it, also my taste for it. I always try to have honey in the comb on hand, eating a little of it as I feel inclined. C. Mills knows where to get dark colored honey from farmers, direct, at 15 cents a box, and brings me a dozen boxes at a time, as I ask for it. The farmers sell their honey in the summer and fall and our needs have to be anticipated for winter or we get none. Each box of honey is called a pound, many of them are only partially filled. Who cares? It s honey enough and cheap enough. COMB HONEY All day long the butterfly and bee search for their food, far and near, WHOLE WHEAT BREAD If any one who is a user of whole wheat bread will try this experiment, he will see for himself one of my objections to it. Cut a thick slice of...
