Ex-cop turned dog walker Catherine Swope is struggling to discover a new career path and a sense of belonging. Both vanished when she left Florida law enforcement after a justified shooting in the line of duty. When the heavy-handed actions of Gavin Allison, Summer Hills Zoning Commissioner, create a near riot at the monthly commission meeting, Catherine is the first on the scene. Her quick response protects the commissioners from the fury of the enraged residents. Flush with the success of her actions, Catherine allows herself to celebrate, believing she is ready to handle both her liquor, and return to the force. Her drinking results in an unfortunate phone call to Gavin to collect a debt. The next morning a news story breaks revealing the Zoning commissioners affair with a teenage girl when he was a partner in a prominent Miami law firm. Catherine, on a mission to apologize for her drunken call, discovers his body hanging in his garage and morphs into cop mode. She reports the death and then secures the scene expecting kudos for her actions. Unfortunately, when the police play the victims answering machine, her drunken message promising to see him in the morning sounds like more threat than appointment, and she becomes the lead suspect. Catherine turns to her by-the-book boyfriend, Mike Reardon, a Summer Hill police lieutenant to assist her in clearing her name. But Mikes boss pulls him off the investigation citing conflict. The medical examiner issues a death certificate that does not indicate a manner of death. This dovetails conveniently with very public revelations of the victims past indiscretions, money problems and a sizeable balloon mortgage payment coming due. The police are content to close the investigation based...
