Not illustrated. 1882 Excerpt: .a sense, out of the world, particularly after a ferry was established at Granton, which took away the traffic, such as it was, that passed between the North and South Queensferries, and when mails and travellers were carried by. rail, and in the absence, till lately, of any railway in the neighbourhood. Notwithstanding that the dignified ancient burgh thus became (what it was pretty much always) a sleepy little place, out of sight and almost out of mind, we could still have expected that such an important work as the Encyclopedia Britannica would have been more accurate in its description of it than to have said that it is beautifully situated on the brow of an acclivity rising from the margin of a Day called St. Margaret s Hope. Had Inverkeithing been situated in some secluded nook on the coast of Japan, in place of within...
