Excerpt from Journal of the British Dental Association, Vol. 23: A Monthly Review of Dental Surgery; January to December, 1902 Fig. 7. - Photograph of transverse section of shell of Pinna. Shown in the light spaces. These dots are not shown, you will see, in the outer spaces where the hexagonal fields, as well as the appearance of inter-spaces are quite clear. Now there is a very curious fact in this connection which I ask you to observe. Photographs of transverse sections of enamel rods in critical focus show a dotted appearance very similar to the secondary markings on this diatom. These dots I have described as representing the transverse sections of calcified plasmic strings as shown in the ameloblasts, but Dr. Walkhoff says that the enamel prism is grainless or structureless, precisely as the outer or out-of-focus region of spaces in the Tricarium appear to be. I therefore conclude that Dr. Walkhoff, notwithstanding his theoretically critical attitude, has not succeeded in getting a critical field of vision in his microscope. I shall make this point plainer to you presently. It would have served Dr. Walkhoff's purpose much better if he had used a transverse section of the Pinna shell (fig. Here the interprismatic substance is very much finer and in an ordinary specimen it might easily appear that the prisms lie in actual contact, particularly as they have sharply angular outlines. But decalcification and also the use of certain staining agents demonstrate that the prisms are actually separated by a discrete substance. It is to be noted that Dr. Walkhoff discourages the use of acids in the treatment of enamel. Here, again, it may be that acids...
