Her arms were already beginning to grow tired. She looked at the windowsill, which was mere inches above her tightly clenched fists, and knew that it was as out of reach as the sun. Her gaze traveled down the makeshift rope to where the base of the tower was lost in the rising fog. She swallowed and closed her eyes briefly. Then, with a whispered prayer, she forced her left hand open. The jerk as her body dropped was just short of too hard; the fingers of her right hand held. Her grip, at least, was strong. She wrapped her left hand around the rope and eased down as best she could with a jerk that was a little less intense. Her legs twisted involuntarily around the rope and she found that it lessened the strain. The desperate jerks became more of a controlled fall than climbing. Then, the bottom of the knotted bedding slipped around her legs and she found herself at the very bottom of the rope. Her feet swung...
