Commissioner of Agriculture, and Dr. D. E. Salmon, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry: Delivered Before the National Cattle Growers Convention, Held at Kansas City, Mo., October 31 and November 1-2, 1887 For six months the plague had been near you and you did not suspect its presence. And just here many men, through ignorance of the facts, reach wrong conclusions. They say if the disease were as dangerous as reported it could never have been stamped out after remaining unrestricted for half a year. They remember, of course, that it existed scarcely longer than that in England before it was recognized, and that it remains there to-day, in spite of the greatest exertions to eradicate it. The difference in the two cases is just here: We had a system of railroads and telegraphs reaching to all parts of the country, which England did not have in 1842. More than that, we had a Bureau of Animal Industry with a liberal appropriation at its disposal for investigation. This England did not have, nor did she have any law to control the disease for twenty-five years after its introduction, and during this time it became too widely scattered, too thoroughly fixed, to be stamped out without more thorough measures than have ever been enforced there. Let me repeat, therefore, that the outbreak of 1884 has been suppressed only because we had money and men to investigate its location, and railroads and telegraphs by which we could trace affected animals across hundreds of miles of territory within a few hours. The third lesson is the serious extent to which such an insidious disease may...
