These citizen-electors were forty-eight in number, and swore they would only choose such magistrates as were honest, and had the good of the State at heart. Each quarter furnished six, the town being divided into eight quarters. The privileges of these men were various. Amongst others they might assemble four times a year for the purpose of deliberating on the affairs of the Province, comprising peace and war, which, according to a writer of the time, gave them considerable authority over their fellow-townsmen. The hall where the Council of Magistrates was held and where also the Municipal Council held their meetings, is still hi existence. A magnificent picture, dated 1667, which still hangs in the Council Chamber, gives one a very good idea of what those Assemblies of Justice were like a couple of centuries ago. It is the portrait of the sixteen magistrates and four secretaries holding office at that time. Each one is sitting in his place. The two men, who were elected every quarter, occupy the President s desk, and the four secretaries the small table in front. Each figure is robed in black, as becomes the office of judge. Each face is expressive of strong character, and a conscientious honesty. The picture is by Terburg, and it certainly is a marvellous display of the exactness and power of observation generally attributed to that gifted being. The colouring and style are very charming, Terburg was born...
