Excerpt: .of study in zoology, and he was, during this time, a member of my family. During the autumn, his task consisted of the study and mapping of the post-tertiary deposits within a radius of ten miles of Amherst, and in the progress of the work I had opportunity to watch the intelligence and skill with which he acquired the new methods of research, and years after it gave me great pleasure to present to his wife the artistic map which he prepared as the result of his season s work. In the winter I set him to select from the great mass of duplicates of the college as complete a collection of living invertebrates as possible, and to name, classify and arrange them, as a preparation for a corresponding study of the fossils of the older formations, which he took up later. He also,...
