Excerpt: . colleagues had placed their hopes upon the youthful conqueror of the Tyrol, the brave and unfortunate Joubert. Overtures were made to him; he modestly replied that he was not yet sufficiently known by victory to repose upon his laurels; they gave him the command of the army of Italy. If, instead of falling at Novi, Joubert had vanquished Suwarrow, his glory would have sufficed to balance that of his rivals. I so little expected the return of Napoleon, that I had embraced with ardour the hope that Sieyes had placed in the victories and virtues of Joubert. His early loss appeared to us a public calamity., > After that loss, Sieyes was fearful that the struggle, thanks to the influence of the generals of the council, might finish against the directory. I believe, though unable to say positively, that the overtures made to...
