Excerpt: .Up to this time I had heard much of the West opening beyond the great lakes, and had a strong desire to try fortune in a larger field. The financial crash of 1836-7 had bankrupted the whole country, put an end to all new enterprises, and nearly forced a suspension of all forms of business. Emigration received a check and actually turned back eastward, owing to the sickness and privation endured by the first arrivals, especially in Michigan, Indiana and Illinois. Multitudes perished, and other multitudes fled to escape the agues and other diseases that were well nigh universal. The accounts that came back were harrowing in the extreme, and the suffering indisputably great. Nevertheless I determined, when opportunity offered, that I would take the risk, and pass from the timbered regions in which I had always dwelt, into the prairie country which I had never seen. May 21, 1845, I took steamer at Cleveland, for Milwaukee, in Wisconsin Territory, reaching that port five days later. As the stages across the territory were only semi-weekly, and a delay of three days would be required, I hired a horse, and made the trip to Madison on horse-back, following a road that was most of the way little else than a mere trail. Settlements were very few, and farm houses from ten to twenty miles apart. Madison was at that time a hamlet, located in a young forest or thicket, the houses few, and mainly built on...
