Excerpt: . . . which there is hope of a crop turned to tillage, all the ploughs have been more than doubled. Fine linen webs manufactured here are specially commended, so that among all the inhabitants of the neighbouring parts who are not brought up to this pursuit, webs from this district have name and fame. Hence arises no small profit to the inhabitants, who attend all the summer fairs with them. Of oxen, particularly those fattened on grass for the mart, of sheep, and of horses also for country needs there is the requisite abundance, and likewise for the supply of the markets. Most of the inhabitants are the relatives, and all are the dependants of the Marquis of Huntly, now for several centuries the proprietor of this district. The Castle of Strathbogie, whence the district has its name, pleasantly situated at the junction of the said...
