Excerpt from Captain Jack, the Union Spy, Vol. 3: Or in Vicksburg and Out To arms! to arms, boys! They re coming like the whirlwind! Such was the ominous cry with which Captain Jack Stanley summoned together his company of raw troops. Before his men were fairly out of their tents the gray lines of Confederate soldiers were seen advancing through the thick woods in front of the Union camp, joining in a deadly fire as they pressed forward. Jack seized his sword and, undaunted by the wild confusion and terror which swayed hi men and the Union forces all about them, rallied his company and made ready to withstand the awful onslaught. The enemy s attack was a complete surprise. The Union soldiers had small thought of a battle, and had been lounging about their tents in a manner characteristic of Sunday morning. Many of them had not been in a general engagement, and the first smell of powder and the sight of the determined rebel line filled their minds with fear and caused a large number to turn on their heels and heel to the rear. Captain Stanley s words, however, called many of the older heads to their senses, and before the advancing line had reached the Union camp the latter s battle line had been formed and a stubborn defense begun. Give it to em, boys! Captain Stanley cried to his men above the rattle of musketry that was becoming louder every instant; well show em how to fight! Like a rock he stood before his men, and with his sword in one hand and his revolver in the other, urged them to maintain their position. But...
