Not illustrated. 1900 Excerpt: .have checked the enemy, but no steps were taken in the matter for at least half an hour, when the General himself coming up, ordered the work. This was the closing day of the manoeuvres proper, and I have endeavoured in the foregoing sketch to show what was done by a field company, skeleton though it was, what might have been done and what was left undone. As I have already said, I do not put this forward as a faultless example of the course we might follow at manoeuvres, but I think it is possessed of germs which might be considerably developed at future peace operations so as to bring forth good fruit. Concluding Remarks. Before closing this lecture I wish to draw your attention to an admirable way of studying the work of Engineers in the field suggested by the late Captain R. da Costa Porter, and described by him in an article which you will find in Vol. XXI. of the R.E. Professional Papers. He takes the Battle of Woerth as an example, and, having closely followed its details, works out a scheme showing what might have been done by the Engineers which was not done, and what effect this might have had on the final issue. Any of you who feel inclined for the task should take some battle of which we have detailed account; imagine yourself in command of a field company, R.E., at war strength attached to a division, and...
