Not illustrated. 1865 Excerpt: .on New Year s day morning; and a small allowance of money, paid weekly, completed the list of benefits which these four widows received from the charity of good Mistress Alice Hebblethwaite, of Fonnerby. Mistress Alice rested from her labours more than two centuries ago; but a memorial of her works remains until this day in the quaint, ivy-covered almshouses at Fonnerby. I should think there was not one person in the town who did not know all the story I have been telling. To me it was quite familiar while I was still a child; for my dear mother, who used to make me the constant companion of her walks, told me all about the almshouses, and very often have I gone with her to visit the old ladies who lived in them. Many children think it very irksome to spend even a small portion of their time in the company of old people, but it was never a task to me to do so; and, for a little girl, I had quite a large number of acquaintances with hoary heads, in whose society I used to take a great delight. But that was all my dear mother s doing. She was very careful to teach me to pay great respect to the aged. She showed me how God had given an especial commandment on this subject: I remember the text at this moment, for she made me learn it by heart: Thou shalt rise...
