The Senate of the United States, which disgraced itself by angry discussions concerning its prerogatives, redeemed its character by the adoption of the Treaty between England and America. We can almost forgive the unworthy debates, the waste of days, in the attempt to vindicate fancied privileges, after this act of statesmanship. Let us forget that it took senators a longer time to accuse one another for revealing what the nation had a right to know at the beginning, than to debate the treaty itself; and let us only remember that their fitting duty has been so nobly done.
