Excerpt from The Poultry-Keeper s Vade-Mecum No branch of stock-breeding is, or can be, so general as poultry-keeping, which is within the opportunity of almost every section of the community, each carrying out the work in accordance with its immediate conditions. That is certainly the case with fowls, and to a lesser extent with ducks. Geese and turkeys can alone be profitably bred where space is abundant. Important points to be considered are that whilst fowls are small in size of body they are active by nature, and that they require regular attention and control. In this respect they differ from larger stock. Cattle and sheep may be left more to themselves during the growing and feeding stages. Poultry cannot be so treated. Therefore the prime factor is the human element. That explains, to some extent, the relatively small number of fowls kept on larger farms, though much more might be done by increase of the flocks in charge of each individual. It is to these greater holdings we must look for breeding geese and turkeys. About the Publisher Forgotten...
